1. [redacted] no formal medical research programs which were underway in China. [redacted] This lack was due to dislocations caused either by World War II or the Communist takeover. [redacted] informal research projects were being carried on by individuals at a number of hospitals. At the University Hospital in Nanking, for example, a group [redacted] did a considerable amount of work on schistosomiasis based on [redacted] experience in treating several hundred cases of this disease [redacted] this work ceased [redacted] 25X1
2. [redacted] two other specific research programs: Dr F L Chung's (鍾良才) work on kala-azar in Peiping and Dr Kuo Shao-chou's (郭紹周) work on hookworm at Chengtu. Both these men have been working on their respective programs for a considerable period of time. Both of these diseases are, of course, very common in China. 25X1
3. In Nanking, there was an organization known as the Central Health Institute (Chung-yang wei-sheng-yuan (中央衛生院)). [redacted] this organization had done some virus studies under the leadership of its Director, Dr Huang Chen-hsiang (黃植祥), but it was not a very large operation. Huang, [redacted] moved to Peiping. The Communists, of course, took over this organization when they arrived in Nanking. [redacted] 25X1
4. [redacted] the following leading Chinese medical figures, in addition to the ones mentioned above, are still in China [redacted] 25X1
